It was developed for photographic documentation of the motion of man-made space vehicles (launch tubes) in orbit. It was developed to provide track information for any film or video camera recording the launch of space vehicles, particularly the Space Shuttle and Space Launch System, for the purposes of engineering analysis. SOF was developed by the Associated Equipment Company (AEC) as the primary video record of the Space Shuttle with which new motion tracking tracking technology could be compared. The film is essentially a normal closed-circuit television type film but with tracks in a different position and with a special way of tracking objects (transparency in an overlay). It was first used in the Shuttle's launch as a verification tool for determining the precise sequence of events involving the various stages of the launch process, as well as providing illumination of the payload fairing for external cameras. After use as a verification tool, the Space Shuttle crew stopped using the SOF during flight, and it was therefore never used aboard the Space Shuttle. However, it was still used in ground testing of the Space Shuttle's launch complex and other facilities, as well as for checking the accuracy of telescopic or camera-based tracking systems for the safety of the crew and others onboard.
